CER GIVES PARENTS POWER OVER THEIR CHILD'S EDUCATION

Washington, D.C., June 26, 2006 – The Center for Education Reform (CER) today launched Parent Power!, a new website to help parents make sense of schooling today. Parent Power! offers parents the tools they need to be involved in and take control of their child's education.

Inspired by the old maxim "knowledge is power," the Parent Power! website is a valuable resource for parents who want to know more about the ever-changing education issues of today.

"Parent Power! was designed to provide parents with insight into new trends in schooling and offer helpful hints on how they can take a more active role in their local schools," said CER president Jeanne Allen. "We hope that parents will come away feeling informed and empowered."

An easily navigable version of CER's Parent Power! newsletter—which has reached hundreds of thousands of parents—the new website will offer the latest about educational options, innovative curriculums, and standards. Or parents can simply get some ideas on how to make the most of their child's summer vacation.

Parent Power! actively solicits articles from parents about unique experiences they have had educating their children or working for education reform.

Visit Parent Power! [\[link\]](#) today and join the hundreds of thousands of parents already inspired.
